Charges Wide Job Bias Against Jew Restricts Talent Needed By U. S. Economy

The executive head of the American Jewish Committee charged recently extensive discriminatory practices by big American corporations. He said this was resulting in "serious losses" in "management manpower resources."

In this connection, Dr. John Slawson, executive vice president of the pioneer human relations agency, says the New York Times, announced that Harvard and Michigan Universities, in co-operation with his group, had started long-range study projects "to probe the effect of discriminatory practices on the full utilization of management manpower resources."

As "a striking example of the waste of management man-power," he cited his agency's recent studies showing that "Jews constitute less than one-half of one per cent of the total executive personnel in leading American industrial companies."

This was in contrast to the fact that about eight per cent of the college-trained population in the U.S. are Jewish, and that managerial personnel are chosen from the ranks of college graduates, he said.

A section of this survey covered the careers of graduates of the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration. This section of the report indicated that "Christian graduates had found careers with the 160 largest American corporations and financial organizations by more than 20-to-1 ratio over an equal sample of their Jewish classmates."

The study was said to show that "this situation was largely the product of bias against Jewish executive job applicants," says the New York Times. On the basis of this survey, Dr. Slawson said, "it is obvious that crucial segments of our economy are restricting the full potential talent needed by their own companies and for the American economy as a whole."

Reporting at a meeting of the Committee's national executive body at Dallas, Texas, Dr. Slawson stressed that "during the past decade, management personnel employed at 500 of the largest American corporations has increased by 45 per cent."

The demand for management personnel, he said, "will remain high in the next decade, and the extent to which this vital demand is satisfied will influence directly the nation's economic growth."

Dr. Slawson, a ranking social scientist and an authority on intergroup relations, told the session that the projects at Harvard and Michigan would deal with two "rungs of the managerial ladder." The major objective of the Harvard study will be an investigation into the selection of management trainees — "the initial steps towards becoming an executive."

At Michigan, he added, an analysis will be made of "prejudicial and non-prejudicial policies in the different levels of companies' hierarchies" after employment. Michigan, Dr. Slawson said, will attempt "to locate accurately the strongholds of prejudice within the organizations, and Harvard will probe the situation affecting entry into the organization."

The studies at the universities, Dr. Slawson said, according to the New York Times, will determine "the glaring inconsistency between the high ideals of many American business men and the failure of their companies to practice equal opportunity."

The Canadian Jewish Review is still the only Jewish publication in Canada printed in any language reaching the Jewish community which is not sponsored by a group or an organization and which is able to claim membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations.

Leader Of U.S. Religious Zionists Appeals To Kennedy For Aid To Peace

The leader of Orthodox Jewish Zionists in American called on the then President-elect John F. Kennedy to arrange a speedy meeting in Washington between Israeli and Arab leaders for a firm, enduring peace in the Middle East.

Rabbi Bernard Bergman, president of the Religious Zionists of America, appealed to Mr. Kennedy to bring Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion of Israel and President Abdel Gamal Nasser of the United Arab Republic to the conference table to end the tension and strife in that part of the world.

Rabbi Bergman, who is the religious leader of the Riverside Jewish Center in New York, made his plea before 600 delegates at the national convention of the Religious Zionists of America in Atlantic City, N. J. The group, which says it has a membership of 76,000, represents Orthodox Judaism in Zionism.

Dr. Bergman said Senator Kennedy had constantly pledged his good offices "to effectuate a fair and honorable settlement between the Arab countries and Israel," says the New York Times. He maintained that peace and friendly relations among the Middle Eastern states "are absolutely indispensable to prevent any further Soviet incursions into that strategic military sector of the world.

"The American Government," he added, "has a vitally historic mission to resort to effective and powerful means to safeguard Israel and her neighbors from Communist attempts at economic penetration, military dominance and political seizure."

Creating a climate of peaceful communication and dealings between Israel and the Arab nations, Rabbi Bergman said, will bring the entire Middle East a social revolution in hygiene, scientific research, and medical progress.

Rabbi Bergman said the Arab countries would benefit from Israel's great store of trained personnel if they abandoned their "foolhardy and nonsensical program of bestiality, venom, and rancor toward Israel."

He said the Arabs were in "desperate need of a vital social-welfare program to overcome their horrible conditions of poor health, malnutrition, illiteracy, squalor, and emotional instability."

He criticized the State Department for permitting Arab leaders to carry on "a vicious campaign of indefensible black-mailing, immoral boycotting, and shady political pressuring against American business enterprises which maintain commercial associations with Israel."

Shabtai Rosenne, Israeli delegate to the United Nations, reports the New York Times, said his nation's co-operation with the newly admitted African states "is now assuming the proportions of a major national effort on our part."

The Religious Zionists of America, representing Orthodox Judaism in Zionism, at this national convention issued a call to the United Nations and the United States State Department to halt Egyptian interference with Israeli ships and cargos in the Suez Canal.

The 600 delegates also adopted resolutions including the following requests: That the United States Government broaden its program of economic aid to Israel. That the State Department and armed forces remove any barriers to stationing Jewish personnel in any part of the world. That the Soviet Union grant religious freedom and freedom of assembly to its 3,000,000 Jewish citizens. That the governments of the Southern states permit orderly and systematic integration in the schools in conformity with the Supreme Court decision of 1954. That continued support be given to such Israeli fund-raising endeavours as the United Jewish Appeal, Jewish National Fund, Israel Bonds and private investment in Israel.

The convention elected Rabbi Bernard Bergman, head of the Riverside Jewish Center, as president for a second year. He appealed to the Jews of America and the world to adopt "rigorous countermeasures" to lessen the effects of "Arab chicanery in the application of boycott techniques."

He called for a unified drive by all Jewish communities "to destroy the effectiveness and impact of the Arab boycott of Israel by resorting to similar methods against those industrial firms which acquiesce in the pressure of Arab propaganda, discrimination and blackmail."

In a joint report Samuel Spar and Abba Tekuzener, executive vice presidents of the Religious Zionists of America, held that the American Jewish community must raise adequate funds to meet the growing needs of Jewish youth for full-time education, says the New York Times. Rabbi Joseph H. Lookstein, leader of Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun, in New York, appealed to Orthodox congregations to affiliate with the Religious Zionist movement.

The United States was urged to support Israel and to oppose the United Arab Republic for membership in the Security Council of the United Nations. Six hundred delegates of the Religious Zionists of America, representing Orthodox Judaism in Zionism, applauded the plea to the State Department, which was made by Dr. Mordecai Kirshblum, of Brooklyn, N. Y., honorary chairman of the group.

Maintaining that it would be highly advisable and ethical for the United States to consider Israel as a candidate, Dr. Kirshblum said the elevation of Israel to the Council could prove influential in removing "dissension and animosity which dominate the hearts and minds of Arab leaders in the Middle East."

Israel, the rabbi said, possesses all the necessary qualifications for "fairness in diplomatic dealing, impartiality in judging world conflicts, and reverence for human dignity and peace based on her lofty Biblical antecedents."

Israeli membership on the Security Council, he said, "would compel the intransigent Arab states to reconsider the value of entering into negotiations and discussions for a lasting peace in the area."

The Orthodox Zionist leader asked the State Department to make "a valiant and determined effort" to oppose the admission of the United Arab Republic because of "her continued flouting of the decisions of the United Nations in regard to Israel and the Suez Canal."

He said that the United Arab Republic "which considers itself in a state of perpetual combat with a peaceful neighbor," merited the censure and condemnation of the

J.D.C. Budget To Help 300,000 In 25 Nations

The plight of Jews in Africa is worsening, the Joint Distribution Committee was told by Moses A. Leavitt, the executive vice chairman of the organization. He said that in Morocco and other North African nations, where approximately 400,000 Jews live, "the deteriorating economic situation, which followed on the heels of independence, has brought mounting insecurity. The unresolved conflict in Algeria, in particular, may well bring new hardships during the months ahead."

Mr. Leavitt spoke at the organization's forty-sixth dinner, attended by 400 persons, at the Statler-Hilton Hotel, in New York, says the New York Times. At its business meeting the Committee adopted a 1961 budget of $28,775,000. It was estimated that this sum would aid 300,000 persons in twenty-five nations. The largest single allocation, $10,000,000, will be used to help newcomers to Israel.

Many of the few thousand Jews who reached the Congo as refugees from Nazi oppression during World War II are reluctant to leave even now, Mr. Leavitt said. Many have been refugees for a good part of their lives, he said, and "are still not prepared to give up what they have, as tenuous as that may be, for the difficulties of resettlement elsewhere."

The Very Rev. Francis B. Sayre Jr., Dean of the Washington (D. C.) Cathedral and chairman of the United States Committee for Refugees, described the "balance sheet" of World Refugee Year as "solid in achievements though incomplete in results."

Permanent homes were found for relatively few persons during the year, he said, and there remained millions in many parts of the world who had no more reason to hope than they had last year, or the year before.

"So long as there are refugees, the world must not be allowed to forget them," he said.

Edward M. M. Warburg, who was re-elected chairman of the Committee for the sixteenth successive year, spoke of the "miracle" of rebuilding achieved by Jewish communities in Western

W. Germany Says Most Germans Condemn Anti-Semitism

The West German Government has told the United Nations that the "overwhelming majority" of Germans strongly condemn anti-Semitism and are determined to counteract it.

The declaration was made in a report on anti-Semitic vandalism that broke out in Germany last winter and touched off incidents in other countries, says the New York Times. This will be discussed by a group of fourteen representatives who make up the sub-commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities.

The West German report presents a detailed account of the Government investigations carried out after the desecration of a new synagogue in Cologne on Christmas Eve, 1959. It said that 685 incidents had occurred through January 28, but 215 had been cases of "mere scribbling by children."

West German authorities told the United Nations sub-commission that the other offenses appeared to have been the work of individuals, but there was no evidence of a widespread or organized anti-Semitic campaign.

Another report, prepared by the Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations, finds evidence of widespread discrimination in the Soviet Union against the Jewish community and says these sentiments are encouraged by the Soviet regime through its press.

Jabotinsky Twenty Years After

BY ELIAS SILKER, HEAD OF JEWISH LEGION VETERANS

Now, twenty years after his passing, it is perhaps easier, even for one of his admirers and collaborators, to attempt a dispassionate evaluation of Vladimir Ze'ev Jabotinsky, one of the most colourful, complex, and controversial Jews of our century. I use the broader term "Jew" advisedly, in preference to the more limited "Zionist," for Jabotinsky, as a creative personality, first made his mark in fields unrelated to Zionism, even though he is principally remembered for his contribution to the Zionist cause.

Jabotinsky, a lawyer by education, a journalist by profession, was also a gifted novelist and poet, an exceptional linguist, a skillful organizer and an orator of extraordinary powers. Unlike most writers and thinkers, however, Jabotinsky was not satisfied merely to record his various findings, conclusions, and emotions, but was actuated by an ungovernable urge to bring about the fulfillment of those ideas which, in his judgment, demanded realization.

In trying to attain his goals he displayed unusual courage and tenacity which stemmed from sincere conviction in the "rightness" of what he was advocating. As his theories, tenets and vision were, more often than not, considered premature by more timid or more cautious leaders, he found himself in frequent conflict with many of those who were his friends or whom he would have liked to have had as friends. Time and again I heard him deplore the fact that "peace" had to be broken for the sake of revealing a vital truth, or of denouncing a harmful silence, or attaining an urgent objective. Yet, in times of crisis, as we shall see, he strove fervently for peace and understanding.

What made him unique among Zionist leaders was that he became the first soldier in the Zionist movement, in the literal as well as in the figurative sense. What that meant in those days when Jewry, continuing an age-old tradition which was both a means of escape from oppression and aspiration to high spirituality, still regarded itself exclusively in terms of the "People of the Book" cannot now be easily comprehended. This psychological revolution in his thinking, which subsequently affected the thinking of the generation of Zionists who created the State of Israel, stemmed from his rebellion not only against the Galut, which all political Zionists opposed, but against Galut methods of attaining the Zionist goal.

Jabotinsky was the first to advocate mass action as a means of obtaining political rights, or of opposing the curtailment of rights previously granted. His proposal for a Jewish Legion in World War One exploded like a bombshell. At that time the thought of a Jewish unit fighting on one side of the contending forces seemed reckless and dangerous, in addition to being traditionally objectionable. Jewish leadership all but anathematized him. The notable exception was Chaim Weizmann, who privately supported Jabotinsky in this matter.

Like Theodor Herzl and Max Nordau before him, Jabotinsky came to Zionism fresh from the abundant literary vineyards of his native Russia, which regarded and treated his brother Jews as pariahs. At the turn of the century, while still in his early twenties, Jabotinsky was renowned as a foreign correspondent and as a writer of short stories with a Chekhovian flair and of widely read feuilletons.

Under the pen-name "Altalena," which he also used for many of his articles, he translated and introduced to Russian readers a number of outstanding French, Italian, and American poets such as Edmond Rostand, Gabriele D'Annunzio, Dante Alighieri and Edgar Allen Poe, and later on, Chaim Nachmann Bialik. Of his translations from Poe, "The Raven," "The Bells" and "Annabelle Lee" are masterpieces, competing in beauty and power with the originals. He also wrote charming poetry of his own. Jabotinsky could undoubtedly have attained high eminence in the Russian literary world, but he turned from the broad Russian highway to the narrower byway of the Jewish people.

What the Dreyfus Affair was to Herzl, the era of the Kishinev pogrom was to Jabotinsky. Without completely abandoning his Russian writing he joined the Zionist movement and soon his fame as an orator and debater spread far and wide. He was in demand in Lithuania and Poland, in Southeastern Russia and the Ukraine and eventually as far south as the Caucasus and Trans-Caucasia. An upsurge in Zionist ranks — and the grinding of teeth in assimilationist circles, socialist and non-socialist alike — followed in his wake.

World War One brought him to Western Europe as correspondent of the influential Russian newspaper "Rueskoye Slovo". In his brilliant articles, which subsequently were published in book form, he held that the real cause of the war was the Middle East and the Ottoman Empire, whose dismemberment he regarded as inevitable. When the Turkish authorities expelled all Russian Jews from Jaffa and its environs, Jabotinsky went with them to Egypt, hoping to organize a Jewish unit to fight for the liberation of Palestine. The result was the Zion Mule Corps, whose members served as water- and ammunition-carriers on the blistering Gallipoli front. That initial step, though unsatisfactory to Jabotinsky at the time, subsequently proved helpful in organising the Jewish Legion which did not materialize till August, 1917, almost three years later.

Was the revolutionary idea of a Jewish Legion inspired by the war, or did its kernel lie buried deep in the recesses of his mind long before 1914? I believe that Jabotinsky had been nursing the notion of a Jewish fighting force for about a decade but the war gave it concreteness.

In this regard, a short story, Zhidyonok (The Little Jew), which Jabotinsky must have written in 1905 or 1906, after an early visit to Palestine, is most revealing. He depicts a Bar Mitzvah boy, Avinoam, who had been brought to Palestine at the age of six. Exceptionally bright in his studies, the boy speaks Arabic and proves something of a sensation when, in an Arab village school, he is able to read a geography map in Arabic which his Arab classmates found puzzling. Nevertheless, Avinoam deprecates knowledge and learning as trifles.

As a result of a humiliating experience to which he and his older brother, Mendel, had been subjected in their native village in Russia by the local urchins, Avinoam had developed a personal sense of values in which book knowledge was of little importance. What was important was to be a colonist in Galilee. And in order to do that, concludes the young hero (obviously speaking for the author), one must first master two essential skills: the Hebrew language and how to punch an opponent effectively in the jaw.

The Jewish Legion, the organization of the Hagana in Jerusalem in 1920 and, in subsequent years, the advocacy of a legal, wholly Jewish defense force to assure the safety of the National Home in Palestine, were essentially the extension of Avinoam's philosophy. That philosophy — the development of a Jew who possesses and loves his own soil, who possesses and loves his own language and who possesses the physique and skill to defend what is rightfully his — later found expression in Jabotinsky's famous novel "Samson the Nazirite", written in Russian and known in English as "Judge and Fool" and later as "Samson and Delilah." In an exchange between Samson and Karni, a proud and beautiful Zoraite girl of whom he is fond and who is favored by his parents, Jabotinsky conveyed not only an elaboration of little Avinoam's viewpoint but also his own attitude toward Jewry and the allurements of foreign camps.

Samson and Karni are walking together. He has just asked her to be his wife. She loves him but she wavers. Would he truly be a husband to her? Would he call a halt to his escapades, romantic and punitive, among the Philistines? Would he give up his Philistine friends? To her questions Samson replies:

"I am a Nazirite. In the year of the earthquake Jehovah's ambassador came to my mother and gave me an assignment. To carry it out I was given strength in my shoulders and power to rule over men. Our tribe would find it hard to live without a defender and avenger. This is the life that was assigned to me; it can't be changed."

She replied, tears trembling in her voice: "In a year, or five years, when your wife will be bending over her baby's cradle, her husband will be brought to her with his head split open."

"I don't know; this is not my business but yours. Choose. But let me finish. Yes, my gang and my friends are in Timnah (his Philistine stamping grounds); in Zora I have no friends and never will have any. But if we build a house I will part with Timnah forever. They (Philistines) will never see me as their guest; if they do see me it will be as their destroyer . . ."

That, fundamentally, was the philosophy which Jabotinsky laid down for his followers. It was to "build" Jews who would be strong-willed and self-disciplined, fearless men, builders and defenders of their people's home, strong enough to abandon and forego the temptations of the Philistine camps.

Jabotinsky, of course, is best known as the founder of the Revisionist movement in Zionism. Its program, with the exception of its continuing insistence on the claim to Israel's historic boundaries, is today as obsolete as the programs of all the Zionist factions which at the time of Jabotinsky's death were at loggerheads with Revisionism and, in lesser measure, with each other.

Though the bitterest conflicts were engendered by the differences in social programs, these, for Jabotinsky, were not at the heart of the matter. The original maximalist revisions he fought for were differences in timing and methods rather than in essential aims. And they were determined by his temperament on the one hand and by his incisive analytical power on the other.

When, for instance, he demonstratively tore up his delegate's card at the Seventeenth Zionist Congress in 1931, he did not do so because he believed that the majority that had voted against defining the ultimate aim of Zionism as the Jewish State, was against such definition. He tore up his card because he believed that in the political conditions prevailing after the Passfield White Paper it was imperative to make that declaration as a preventive to further whittling away of Jewish rights under the Mandate. Zionists came around to such a declaration in their adoption of the "Biltmore Program" in New York in 1942, but Jabotinsky was no longer among us to hear it.

World War Two came at a time when the breach between him and the other Zionist groups appeared to be widening even more. Jabotinsky had been advocating the "evacuation" of Polish Jewry but unfortunately the fears which prompted him to sound the warning were not properly understood. His warning, alas, proved justified. Poland was overrun and its Jews were trapped. The enormity of the crisis was no longer debatable. The closing of Zionist ranks, indeed of Jewish ranks, it was apparent, was highly imperative. Jabotinsky, then, came to America in quest of such an understanding.

Of equal importance to peace in Zionist ranks, Jabotinsky felt, was the creation of a Jewish Army consisting of war refugees and citizens of countries not yet in the war, as well as sons of the Palestine Yishuv. He had submitted a memorandum to that effect to the British War Cabinet but had received no reply. In view of Britain's Mandate policies no early consent could be expected.

To get the British War Cabinet to act it was essential to secure the support of other members of the British Commonwealth, such as Canada and South Africa. Jabotinsky decided to approach Canada first. As the holder of a Nansen passport he could not enter the Dominion and he delegated this writer to approach the Canadian government for the purpose of (a) securing Canada's support of a Jewish Army, and (b) of permitting the establishment of transit training camps for such units as might be organized on the American continent.

When, with the co-operation of Marcus M. Sperber, K.C., of Montreal, I was enabled to approach the late Peter Bercovitch, then a leading Liberal and Jewish member in the Canadian Parliament, he promised to help but warned me that neither Defense Minister Norman Rogers nor Prime Minister Mackenzie King would lend an attentive ear unless the president of the Zionist Organization of Canada, the late and lamented Archibald Freiman, would at least not oppose the idea of a Jewish Army. I decided to see Mr. Freiman.

Although he was ill at the time, he received me at his home in Ottawa. We spent several hours discussing the matter and reached a satisfactory understanding. The negotiations lasted for about six weeks and on their successful conclusion I showed Mr. Freiman the corroborating communication from the Canadian Government.

"You and I worked in peace and harmony," he said, "Why can't others do likewise?"

"Jabotinsky is willing," I replied. "If you want to hear it from him personally, I'll phone New York and you talk to him."

Jabotinsky confirmed his willingness to make peace. Mr. Freiman, despite his poor health and the summer heat, undertook to take the matter up with the top Zionist leadership in New York. He arranged to meet with them on Monday, August 5, 1940. But early Sunday morning, August 4, Jabotinsky's turbulent life ended at Camp Betar in upper New York State. From his summer home near Toronto, Mr. Freiman came to pay his last respects and to attend a "peace" conference which had become futile.

Now, twenty years later, Jabotinsky, in his lonely grave on Long Island, is still waiting for that complete and eternal peace which, as implied by his last will and testament, he will find only in the soil of Israel for which he so gallantly fought.

The employees in a restaurant have a responsibility to the public to help prevent the spread of disease. They should keep their hands scrupulously clean by washing them immediately before handling food, dishes, or cutlery.

Hunters who wander away from their party into deep bush may easily become lost, with serious results or even death. Topographical maps and a compass, plus the knowledge of how to use them, will often help the lost person to find his way to safety. It is wise to carry matches and a small cooking set, with dried foods that can be heated if the wanderer isn't found within a short time. Panic is the important thing to guard against.

ties, resorts and travel both within and outside our own borders. Far too many resorts and travel agencies use race, religion, and national origin as a measuring standard for acceptance. Far too many educational institutions still employ a quota system along similar lines."

Labor is playing an ever-increasing role in human relations commissions throughout the nation. In New York, Detroit, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Chicago, and Los Angeles, labor leaders have key positions on these commissions.

According to the survey, New York State will pass an anti-bias-in-housing measure during the early days of the new legislative session, and with the newly created civil rights committee of the New York City AFL-CIO Central Labor Council leading, the present Sharkey-Brown-Isaacs Law dealing with discrimination in housing, will be strengthened.

The survey said that since labor played a major role in the election of key national and Congressional figures, "the promissory notes signed by both major parties in their platforms to enact strong civil rights and humane immigration laws, will have to be redeemed at the earliest moment."

The 1961 budget was adopted after a report by Charles H. Jordan, director-general of the committee's overseas operations, says the New York Times. It was submitted to the National Conference of the United Jewish Appeal, which provides the Committee with the bulk of its funds.

RELIGIOUS ZIONISTS

United Nations and not admission into the Security Council.

Dr. Zorach Warhaftig, of Jerusalem, chairman of the committee on law and constitutional affairs of the Knesset (Israeli Parliament), called for an assembly of religious and rabbinic bodies over the world in Jerusalem in 1961, says the New York Times. Its purpose, he said, would be to unify the voice of Orthodox Jews in the face of the grave problems of Orthodoxy in this era.

He observed that traditional Judaism was now making progress in Israel and declared that religious Zionism was primarily responsible. Dr. Warhaftig said religious education was making phenomenal strides in capturing the imagination of many non-observant Jews in Israel.

Zionism and Americanism are completely compatible, said the leader of the Orthodox Jewish Rabbinate in the United States, Dr. Charles Weinberg, of Malden, Mass., president of the Rabbinical Council of America, congratulating the American voter "on his superb sense of fairness in repudiating any religious test for the American presidency."

Addressing 600 delegates to the national convention of the Religious Zionists of America, Dr. Weinberg said:

"Democracy cannot survive, if its citizens are ever denied access to those rights and privileges which naturally accrue to all Americans of whatever religious persuasion or background, be they Protestant, Catholic, or Jew.

"It is a source of gratification that our Presidential candidates in 1960 were judged by 67,000,000 Americans on the basis of their inner qualities, personal merit, and experience."

Dr. Weinberg asserted that Zionists in America and elsewhere were fully loyal and dedicated citizens who understood clearly the responsibilities and obligations of American citizenship and nationality. He said those who espoused anti-Zionism had "distorted and perverted the true concepts of patriotism and are laboring in a framework of illusion, ignorance, and moral irresponsibility."

Rabbi Simon Dolgin, of Los Angeles, Cal., told the convention that religious Zionism was performing "most crucial and essential services" in combatting all types of assimilation in the western part of the United States by building and maintaining a network of religious schools and adult centers of learning.

Rabbi Leon Kats, of Passaic N. J., reported that the influence of the decisions of rabbinic courts of Israel in the field of personal status was permeating rabbinic bodies over the world, says the New York Times. The opinions of the rabbinic courts of Israel, he said, show there is no conflict between religious and secular law in developing a sound legal system.

Jewish Labor Committee Survey Envisions Big Advances In Civil Rights In 1961

The year 1961 will bring more promise and performance of civil rights achievement in America, a Jewish Labor Committee year-end survey shows. The organization, representing some half million Jewish workers in the AFL-CIO, works through 17 field offices throughout the United States and Canada in the human rights field. Its National Trade Union Council for Human Rights is headed by Charles S. Zimmerman, vice-president of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, and is chairman of the AFL-CIO's civil rights department.

The JLC survey took cognizance of "an increased national tempo to rip down the barriers of racial and religious discrimination." The survey cited the election of a Catholic as President of the United States; the selection by Senator Kennedy of two Jews to the Cabinet, and of prominent Negroes to other high Federal posts as indicative "of a new spirit that will sweep the 60's in proportions undreamt of even by the most ardent proponents of civil rights."

The survey showed that American labor had made deep inroads in eliminating vestiges of discrimination with in its own ranks. The survey said that in 1960 Negroes have been offered apprenticeship training in New York City's plumbing industry; that the first Negro electrician ever hired on a federal construction project in Washington, D.C., is working after being processed through Local 26 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in the capitol; and that J. C. Daniel, a Negro, was elected president of Local 18, Hod Carriers and Common Laborers Union in Houston, Texas, which is one of the largest integrated locals in the Southwest, with some 1800 members.

In addition, it pointed to the Oregon Building Trades, Metal Trades and Service Trades Councils working with that state's Apprenticeship Council to train Orientals and Negroes, who have since become tool and die-makers, optical technicians, auto mechanics, body and fender repairmen, carpenters and brick masons.

The American Federation of Musicians, in 1960, the survey showed, merged separate locals in Miami, and Jacksonville, Florida; Baton Rouge, Louisiana; Memphis, and Nashville, Tennessee; San Francisco, California, among others areas, including a local in North Carolina, in order to end segregation.

The survey stated: "It was the American labor movement that first recognized the student sit-in movements in the South and these efforts won immediate support from AFL-CIO President George Meany and other high ranking officials of organized labor. When the sit-in movement needed an atmosphere of support most, the American labor movement demonstrated its solidarity with that cause and continues to give it."

It also cited as an example how the Minnesota Federation of Labor and allied labor groups, including the Jewish Labor Committee and the Workmen's Circle, had aided Indians living on that state's reservations in being oriented to industrialized employment and training under union standards. Labor organizations paid tuitions, fares and other expenses for qualified Indians in order that they might learn trades and apply their newly acquired knowledge in Minnesota's industry.

Regional offices of the AFL-CIO, as well as local unions, have added Negroes and other minority group personnel to responsible positions throughout the nation in ever-increasing numbers, the survey indicated.

The JLC survey contrasted labor's efforts in getting Fair Employment Practices measures passed in 16 states through the years with attempts to frustrate such legislation by employer groups.

The survey turned to the national scene and predicted that while "any violent change in the Rules of the Senate to assure that filibuster will be curtailed is so far remote, there is confidence in the ranks of those who urge such rule changes that some progress will be made and that a change in the rules is within the realm of immediate realization." In the same vein, the survey said that the House Rules Committee will be enlarged to enable a more equitable debate on civil rights legislation.

Turning to immigration, the JLC survey pointed out that a change in the discriminatory national origin quota systems embodied in the current McCarran-Walter Immigration Act "will be undoubtedly changed by either a direct assault or compromise, the result of which will be the elimination of this undemocratic section of the law." In the field of education, the JLC survey said that 1960 "began what 1961 will continue: a frontal assault by labor and allied groups on segregation in schools on the national, state, and local levels."

"Labor," the survey said, "will continue to press for legal measures to liquidate vestiges of discrimination in recreational facili-
